At 14:46 on March 11, 2011, Tohoku, northeastern region in Japan, was soon inundated by a tsunami which stretched in some places over ten meters tall and five kilometers inland. The catastrophe is now known around the world as the Great Eastern Japan Earthquake. 15,882 people lost their lives.

Tohoku Regional Bureau (TRB) of MLIT made all possible preparations, but, when faced with a crisis of the scale of March 11, what we prepared was still not enough. A successful response of course required both detailed preparation and training for MLIT staff. However, the reality of a large-scale disaster also required us to exceed the basic standards of preparation at every level. Regardless of training and preparation, every disaster presents unique dangers, risks, facts and circumstances. It is impossible for those involved in disaster response operations to foresee every risk in advance.

Based on our experience of the March 11 disaster response, the TRB is convinced that we must approach every disaster fully prepared, which also requires being aware of past events and being able to apply that knowledge to the unique circumstances of each disaster quickly, flexibly and effectively. However, we should also be ready to modify plans, take initiative and go beyond standard procedures to respond to the reality of each disaster.

We hope that this book will assist all the leaders and personnel who face large-scale natural disasters to plan and execute operations more effectively in future disaster events.
